The Office of Strategic Services Society celebrates the historic accomplishments of the OSS during World War II – the first organized effort by the United States to implement a centralized system of strategic intelligence and the predecessor to the Central Intelligence Agency and the U.S. Special Operations Command – and educates the American public regarding the continuing importance of strategic intelligence and special operations to the preservation of freedom.

"If you define leadership as having a vision for an organization, and the ability to attract, motivate and guide followers to fulfill that vision, you have Bill Donovan in spades."

- FISHER HOWE

"The OSS was an organization designed to do great things."

- PROFESSOR E. BRUCE REYNOLDS

"I have never known such a bunch of troublemakers in my life."

- BERNARD KNOX
